Customer Reviews

"Before the Web came along, there were only three ways to get noticed: buy expensive advertising, beg the mainstream media to tell your story for you, or hire a huge sales staff to bug people one at a time about your products." -- says David Meerman Scott in the introduction to "The New Rules of Marketing and PR." This book is an excellent overview of web marketing principles. I recommend this text to anyone who wants to become a better web marketer. The New Rules became a best seller through online marketing. After a successful career in PR, Scott created a blog, gave away 250,000 ebooks, and mailed advance copies of his printed books to prominent bloggers. The old way of launching a book would have been exclusively through sales, press releases, advertising and a book tour. Early on Scott describes how the old ways are becoming increasingly inefficient, ineffective, and often insulting. Scott's essential message is that you can now bypass the traditional marketing channels and reach out directly to customers, provided you have a worthwhile offering and message. To do this, you must philosophically move from monologue to dialog and from propaganda to participation. These necessary changes in marketing approach are the result of the Internet's expansion of communication channels from one-to-many . . . to many-to-one . . . to many-to-many . . . to one-to-one. These four communication modalities combined with the ability to bypass land-based distribution channels and transact commerce online represents a sea change in marketing. Scott recommends that contemporary marketers think like a publisher. "Publishers consider all the following questions: Who are my readers? How do I reach them? What are their motivations?"
